"I look upon him as a statesman."
—Fifth District Congressional candidate Bobby Richardson on his idol, Strom Thurmond (as quoted in the Charlotte Observer).

Screwing the consumer

Pug Ravenel, take note.

The Consumer Federation of America has named our own U. S. Senator Strom Thurmond a "Consumer Zero" for his votes this session on key measures involving tax reform, food, health, energy legislation and antitrust. The federation named New Hampshire Democrat John Durkin its only "Consumer Hero" — while giving Thurmond the company of 14 other senators like Barry Goldwater of Arizona, James Eastland of Mississippi, Roman Hruska of Nebraska and James Buckley of New York. Strom and his buddies were cited for "never having voted for the consumer position" in the 14 key test votes selected. "Consumer Hero" Durkin cast the correct vote in each instance.

A CFA spokeswoman noted: "The Ford administration has constantly pressured Republicans in Congress to support their anti-consumer position on key amendments. The result has been a decline in support for consumers among Republican members."

Thurmond Edwards

Apparently the pressure from the Ford White House started getting to Thurmond; hence, a perfect score for the man whose rhetoric always stresses his concern for the average Joe, but whose votes categorically support the interests of Exxon, AT & T or whatever multinational corporation that might be involved.

Meanwhile, as Ravenel contemplates a race against Thurmond in 1978, he might contemplate the Thurmond consumer voting record as well.

No ruling on Hutchinson

Not surprisingly, three federal agencies have recommended denial of the belated permits being sought by the Hutchinson Island Partnership to legalize dredge-and-fill operations on the coastal island in Colleton County.

In separate communications to the U. S. Army Corps of Engineers district office in Charleston, the Interior Department, Environmental Protection Agency and Department of Commerce each recommended that the areas that were diked by the partnership be restored to their former condition.

Hutchinson Island Partnership (HIP), you may remember (Osceola, Aug. 27), is owned by predominantly Charleston interests, including Governor Jim Edwards, who owns a 10 percent hunk of the pristine coastal property. HIP performed the illegal operations on the island in 1974, which involved blocking six tidal creeks — a move that destroyed nearly 200 acres of marshland. HIP's remodeling on the island, which its principals say was to build a facility conducive to housing ducks during winter, was completed without the lawful permits that are required in such cases. Therefore the permits are being sought after the fact.

The actions of the three federal agencies in recommending denial of the proposed permits should have a significant bearing on the Corps' decision, which should come soon.

One agency that was less concerned about HIP's activities — at least insofar as was discernible in its communication to the Corps — was the South Carolina Wildlife and Marine Resources Department, which recommended (less than enthusiastically) that one of the two permits be denied.

South Carolina environmentalists have been somewhat more vigorous than S. C. Wildlife and Marine Resources in their opposition. In a letter to Col. Harry Wilson Jr., head of the Corps' Charleston office, the S. C. Environmental Coalition echoed the recommendations of the three federal agencies, writing: "The proposed diking and filling represent large damages and the permits should be denied based on analysis of overall environmental impact. All illegal work to date should be restored at an early date at the expense of the applicant, without any further delays in administrative action in this important case. It is doubtful that the marshes thus far damaged by the actions of the applicant can readily recover, and every effort should be made to see that proper restoration is made."

Remember the Mayaquez?

Time has a way of assessing things that arguments at the moment of an event won't answer for you. Such was the case Tuesday when a General Accounting Office (GAO-the investigative arm of congress) report indicated that the actions taken by President Ford regarding the Mayaguez incident in May of 1975 were unnecessary. Unnecessary, too, was the loss of 41 American lives and the wounding of some 50 more, not to mention the 47 Cambodians who died beside 55 of their wounded comrades.

According to the 162-page report, "The final Marine assault and the bombing of the Cambodian mainland did not influence the Cambodian decision to release the crew." The reports substantiated the stories that the newly installed Cambodian government had decided to release the Mayaguez crew before the Ford procedures took place. The report also suggests that Ford and his advisors paid too little attention to diplomatic initiatives being carried out by third powers.

It was reported immediately after the incident (June 6, 1975) that U. N. Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim was not contacted by Ford until approximately two hours after the U. S. Marines assault had begun. This occurred amid Ford Administration statements that all peaceful, diplomatic channels were being pursued.

Of course, Ford spokesmen disagree now with the GAO report as they did with critics at the time, and there is hint from those quarters that this untimely report is little more than partisan politics in the heat of an election year.

We have no argument with the idea that this is politics because, after all, it is a dirty business. But the incident that gave the dwindling Ford administration support a shot in the arm back in the spring of 1975 is making poor old Jerry look pretty bad today. What made him look cool and decisive a little less than a year and a half ago is making him look a lot like a "chump" now.

But let's pin the tail on the donkey too, because the majority of the Congressional leaders — including South Carolina's — who were questioned at the time were fully behind the Ford actions. Don't hear anything from them now though, do you? Nope! They're going to let old Jer "twist slowly, slowly in the wind." And he should.

It was a stupid thing to do and no "emergency, crisis situation" excuses now can alleviate that stupidity. It was plain old grandstanding on the part of our current President and we're afraid he's going to have to eat this one.

Course, we all like to forget those uncomfortable times. After all, it was so long ago. We're no more ready to make a big deal out of 41 dead Americans today than we were back when it happened. Carter might have gotten a dig in during the foreign policy debate, but Ford just replied that we needed decisive action and that he did what he thought was the best thing at the time.

In a few days we'll all have forgotten this unfortunate mess and we'll go about the business of picking a President to deal with future Mayaguezes. We'll no doubt, have plenty of other messes to keep us occupied if the past is any indication of the future. Anyway, we're not the type to say we told you so, but we did.

Butz

Legislators blast Edwards

Three black legislators opened fire on Governor Jim Edwards last week, charging him with "an obviously partisan politically motivated attempt to minimize and rationale the racially degrading statements" made by Secretary of Agriculture Earl Butz—statements which led to Butz's ouster from the Ford administration.

Edwards, in an October 3 appearance on ABC's "Issues and Answers," compared Butz's remarks to those made by Jimmy Carter in a recent Playboy interview and indicated that he felt too much was being made of the Secretary of Agriculture's racial joke. Edwards refrained from offering any suggestions as to what course President Ford should follow in the Butz matter.

You're probably familiar with the details of the Butz bungle by now. Butz was flying to the west coast following the National Republican Cnvention. His plane companions included Christian/singer Pat Boone and Watergate superstaff John Dean, who reported on the convention for Rolling Stone magazine. Boone, an earnest Republican, expressed to Butz his concern over the lack of minority participation in the Grand Old Party. As reported by the New York Times, Butz replied: "I'll tell you why you can't attract coloreds. Because coloreds only want three things. You know what they want? I'll tell you what the coloreds want, it's three things: first, a tight ---; second, loose shoes; and third, a warm place to s---. That's all."

If we accept the governor's argument, Butz's remarks were no worse than those made by Jimmy Carter in his Playboy interview where he uttered disgusting nouns, "lust" and "screw." Black state legislators Joseph R. Murray, McKinley Washington, Jr. and Robert Woods disagreed and compared Edwards' insensitivity to that of Butz in a joint statement issued October 5. "We and our constituents are shocked, incensed and ashamed that our governor would make such a statement," the representatives told the Charleston CHRONICLE. Edwards "has shown his true colors in respect to racism in South Carolina and against all Black citizens of America," they added.

The POLITICAL ECONOMY by Ed Meadows

The stagnant economy

President Ford celebrates how employment has increased in the Republic, but the September figures show employment falling. Ford is less anxious to talk about the real problem, which is unemployment. Here the figures are grim. Still nearly eight million unemployed a year after the recession. The Ford administration blames the high unemployment on women's liberation. William Seidman, Ford's economic guru, claims that women's penchant to "do their own thing" has flooded the job market.

The Carter people have a more plausible explantion. They say the ballooning job market reflects the fact that wives and daughters and other family members have to go to work just to make household ends meet. Where before the present administration there actually were periods in which the male head of the household could earn enough to finance a family' life, even comfortably, now inflation has eroded earning power so much that real income has actually declined in the last few years. The statistics show this: In 1973, real per capita disposable income was at $3,649. In 1974 it fell to $3,582 and last year rose somewhat to $3,607. Average hourly wages have done even worse. In 1973, the average hourly earnings index stood at 110.1. In 1974 and 1975 it remained at 107, and this year the index has risen a piddling one per cent, to 108.

If the still high unemployment and the still low earnings of average Americans is a curse to most people, it is a blessing to Wall Street, and hence the Ford administration. Wall Street investors don't care a whit about unemployment. They already have money or they wouldn't be investors. What these gentlemen prefer is a long, slow recovery, one that keeps inflation low at the expense of jobs. Of course, the administration isn't really even doing that much. For even if unemployment is unchanged, the wholesale price index, an indicator of how prices will change three months or so in the future, rose significantly in September. Again, it's the stereotypical Republican formula--high unemployment and high inflation.

> "Chances are that if the figures for next month on unemployment, price and capital spending look grim, economists will formally declare that we're slipping back into another recession...."

A number of respected economists suggested many months ago that the economy would need more stimulus than it has received, and it now becomes obvious that these economists were correct. If the money supply had been expanded at a rate of perhaps 10 per cent early on, instead of the two to six per cent characteristic of Arthur Burns' Fed over the past two years, our economy would have had the chance to exploit more of its capabilities. In the depths of the late recession, American industry's utilization of its plant capacity fell from 83 per cent in 1973 to 68 per cent in 1975 and this year the figure remains a paltry 73 per cent--still a good ways to go before capacity becomes fully utilized. The significance of this is that when use of plant capacity is low, clearly there is room for expansion of employment. Then workers can man the idled machines of industry.

Despite the claims of the Ford administration's economists that they're what are nebuluously known as "free enterprise" (i.e., pro-big business) economists, the weak and stalled recovery would never even have begun if Congress hadn't applied some classic Keynesian "pump-priming" to the economy, in the form of tax cuts and rebates. The idea behind this sort of medicine is to stimulate consumer demand, which in turn will stimulate manufacturing, which in turn stimulates higher employment and eventually higher wages. But Americans were badly burned by the recession, and they didn't go out to blow their money in wild buying sprees. In a similar manner, businesses became paragons of financial conservatism, cleaning up outstanding loans and notes, improving their firms' liquidity positions. And even today, business loan demand is almost unaccountably slack. Most businessmen aren't much interested in borrowing.

This is not good. For when corporations borrow, it is generally to pay for expansion of plant and equipment, which usually means more jobs, though not necessarily (many firms buy automated equipment these days, which actually eliminate jobs). The Ford administration has claimed for lo, these many months, that business spending on capital goods (goods used to produce the things we buy) would solidify the recovery. Thus far, it just hasn't happened. And chances are that it won't happen, unless consumer demand is stimulated first. Businessmen invest when they see a prospect for higher profits, i.e., when they see customers out there waiting to buy their products.

It is generally accepted in the statistics-watching trade that it takes three months of figures to make a trend. And while the last three months' figures are not as clear-cut as they might be, the trend they elucidate is less than favorable. For instance, the July unemployment rate was 7.8 per cent. In August it rose to 7.9 per cent and in September the figure fell slightly to 7.8 per cent, while also in September total employment in the economy fell. This is no recovery.

Chances are that if the figures for next month on unemployment, prices and capital spending look grim, economists will formally declare that we're slipping back into another recession. Then one can be sure that Congress will prepare a new tax cut to buoy up a failing economy--failing at the hands of Republican neglect and deliberate inertia.

And if Jimmy Carter wins the presidential election, then we can expect real and substantial efforts to make the economy function again. The

PCB: Fish at your own risk

By John Norton

"Fishing Hot On Hartwell"
Greenville News headline, 1975

Fishing has cooled considerably on the upper Piedmont's 50,000 acre Lake Hartwell since an August 13 announcement by federal and state officials that analyses of fish taken from the lake revealed dangerously - high levels of a suspected cancer - causing agent, polychlorinated biphenyl (PCB). And an examination of PCB-related events in the state over the past six years suggests that the recent cautionary announcement was long overdue.

In South Carolina, the story of PCB contamination has thus far been of interest primarily to residents in the Hartwell area. However, fish and sediment studies conducted by the state Department of Health and Environmental Control in other portions of South Carolina indicate that while PCB concentrations are most intense around Lake Hartwell, traces of the chemical are present in streams, fish, and very probably human bodies, throughout the state.

Polychlorinated biphenyl is a jelly - like, heat-resistant compound used widely in industrial processes in the U. S. and throughout the world. (See box on page 5) A close relative of the more familiar chemical compound DDT, PCB has been linked to skin, liver and pancreatic cancer in humans in several studies conducted over the past five years in the U. S. and Japan.

The Hartwell-PCB story broke in early August when the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) and the state Department of Health and Environmental Control (DHEC) issued the joint warning against consumption of fish caught in the lake and its tributaries. Early news reports revealed a reluctance on the part of EPA and DHEC to identify the source of the PCB pollution; the stories, however, did carry the information that the Sangamo Electric Company's capacitor plant, located in Pickens County on Twelve Mile Creek, a Hartwell tributary, was the only manufacturing firm in the vicinity of the lake (and for that matter, in South Carolina) which used the carcinogenic compound in its manufacturing process.

Sangamo's suspect status was quickly dropped when analyses of the company's treated wastewater discharge revealed PCB concentrations well above a one part per billion (1 ppb) limit currently being considered by EPA. The company claimed that PCBs from its manufacturing process had not been discharged into its waste treatment system for several years; both Sangamo and EPA then postulated that a wastewater settling lagoon previously contaminated by PCBs might be adding the compound to otherwise PCB-free water before it was discharged into Twelve Mile Creek. On August 30, EPA issued a directive ordering Sangamo to reduce the PCB level in their wastewater effluent to one ppb within 30 days. That deadline was later relaxed somewhat when a by-pass of the old lagoon brought about an increase in PCBs in the Sangamo effluent.

Greenville News

> "...Despite the findings and reports which began to proliferate in the early 1970s the Environmental Protection Agency failed to show much interest in PCB infiltration into the environment..."

For the last month and a half Sangamo has attempted by various means to remove the compound from its river discharge. EPA and Sangamo were expected to have a final showdown on the clean-up order this week in Atlanta.

Over the past two months, the Lake Hartwell controversy has produced reams of charges and countercharges.

Both EPA and DHEC attempted to shift the blame for not detecting the problem earlier. The EPA Region IV office in Atlanta charged that DHEC had failed to inform federal officials of the Hartwell situation. DHEC indicated that Sangamo was among a group of 15 industries and municipalities to South Carolina still under EPA supervision after a transfer of monitoring responsibilities in 1974. Evidence was later produced which indicated the EPA complaint against the state was without much foundation; EPA had received regular monitoring reports from Sangamo since March 1975 which indicated the presence of PCBs in the company's discharge. EPA failed to take action.

By early September — a month after the fish warning — tests of sediment and fish on both the Georgia and South Carolina sides of the lake revealed the presence of PCBs in varying quantities throughout the Hartwell system. However, the tests also indicated that the PCBs might eventually be covered over by sediment which would prevent bottom-feeding fish from becoming contaminated. Shortly before the test results were released, Lake Hartwell residents and owners of resort businesses around the lake filed a $1 billion suit against Sangamo, charging that the company had "wilfully, wantonly, negligently, or recklessly" allowed PCBs to enter the lake from its plant in violation of federal and state law.

As a result of the contamination, the plaintiffs added, property values around the lake plummeted and businesses connected with fishing and other resort activities suffered severe losses.

The Hartwell property owners' suit brought up an interesting question. Had Sangamo actually violated the law? The federal government has thus far established no across-the-board limits on amounts of PCB discharge. At present, the only restrictions on industries discharging into public waters are contained in what are generally referred to as "NPDES permits." Under laws establishing the National Pollution Discharge Elimination System, any individual or company discharging waste into a body of water must obtain a permit from EPA which spells out discharge limits for various substances. Sangamo contends that in its permit EPA failed to adequately describe limits for PCB discharges. EPA counters that Sangamo failed to report the presence of PCBs in its discharge in the original permit application. EPA also contends that despite that failure, the Sangamo permit did include a PCB limit — "nondetectable". (The difference of opinion has to do in part with what dashes on the permit mean and whether the sum of nothing and something is something or nothing — let's not go into it.) This difference of opinion resulted in a suit filed in federal district court on Oct. 4 in which Sangamo charged that EPA "abused their discretion" and "disregarded their own administrative procedures" when the agency required the company to comply with "nonexistent" regulations.

At present, Sangamo is still attempting to locate and eliminate all sources of PCB contamination within their plant. The Greenville News, which has done an excellent job of reporting the PCB story, reported on Oct. 7 that the S. C. Wildlife and Marine Resources Department might act on a 1925 South Carolina statute prohibiting the stunning or killing of gamefish with toxic substances. Under the law, the department would have the right to file a civil injunction to require Sangamo to clean up the mess.

The joint EPA-DHEC announcement on August 13 of dangerously-high PCB levels in Hartwell fish followed organic analyses of fish taken from the lake and from Twelve Mile Creek which turned up PCB concentrations as high as 135 parts per million parts of fish. Although such an amount seems minute, the federal Food and Drug Administration has established a safety limit of five parts per million (ppm) in fish harvested for sale. In other words, the most-highly contaminated fish which was analyzed contained 27 times the safety limit established by the FDA. (In Canada, the safe limit is 2 ppm. The FDA is now giving consideration to lowering the U. S. limit.)

DHEC, established by state law as "the sole advisor of the state in all questions involving the protection of the public health," moved rather slowly in announcing the potential hazards connected with eating Hartwell fish. DHEC was aware of a PCB problem in the Twelve Mile Creek area as early as 1970 when a fish kill in the Creek was attributed to PCB discharges from the Sangamo plant. Dr. Lamar E. Priester, Jr., now a DHEC deputy administrator, conducted a study of the Twelve Mile Creek following the fish kill and estimated that Sangamo was dumping about two tons of PCBs per month into the creek. Priester, identified recently by the Greenville News as "a pioneer in PCB detection", told a News reporter last month that in 1970 DHEC was able to get the company to reduce its PCB-contaminated waste discharge to a point where it was no longer toxic to fish. Priester added that state and federal laws in force in 1970 would allow environmental agencies to go no further than to limit toxicity levels. No warnings were issued by DHEC in 1970 concerning the possible health hazards of PCB-contaminated water and fish; however, it is true that results from scientific research into the damaging effects of the compound on human and animal life were still preliminary in 1970.

By 1972, however, the PCB report card was bad enough to warrant a statement from the President's Council on Environmental Quality to the effect that PCBs could have serious adverse effects on human health. The Council recommended that PCB usage be discontinued in all but closed systems where danger of human contact was slight. By 1974, PCBs had been linked to skin disease, jaundice, and toxic damage to the liver and other internal organs. Reports were being disseminated of an incident which occurred in Japan in 1968 when as many as 15,000 Japanese ate rice oil containing 1000-3000 ppm of PCB. Early studies following the incident reported that the victims developed chronic acne, "cheese-like discharges from the eyes," skin darkening, hearing loss, and neurological disorders. Newborns displayed abnormal skin pigmentation and there were fewer births and more still births among the contaminated population. (Last month in New York Japanese scientists released further findings which established definite links between PCB ingestion and increases in skin, liver and pancreatic cancer.)

Despite the findings and reports which began to proliferate in the early 1970s, the Environmental Protection Agency failed to show much interest in PCB infiltration into the environment. In 1974, the Environmental Defense Fund brought suit against EPA to force the agency to establish standards for PCB discharges into navigable waters. Finally, in the summer of 1975, after considerable public furor over PCB contamination of New York's Hudson River, EPA began a comprehensive survey of PCB users and dischargers in the United States.

In the absence of a mandate from EPA, South Carolina's Department of Health and Environmental Control also failed to take any action in connection with PCBs, either to control discharges or to establish whether PCBs already in the environment were endangering the public health. Priester's 1970 PCB studies in the Lake Hartwell area were somehow lost in the bureaucratic shuffle, a fact which he admitted to a reporter recently. It wasn't until November 20, 1975 that DHEC took any action in connection with PCB contamination in the Hartwell region. On that date, in response to results from routine testing which revealed a significant PCB presence in the finished drinking water supply of the city of Pickens, a team from DHEC's special services section conducted a survey of the Pickens Water Reservoir, the Pickens Water Plant and the Sanagamo Electric Company, taking eight water samples for PCB analysis.

On January 2, 1976, W. B. McAndrew of the special services section sent a memorandum to various DHEC chiefs, including agency second-in-command John Jenkins and Thomas C. Kurimcak, director of the analytical services division .McAndrew reported that "preliminary data indicates significant concentrations of PCBs in the area surrounding the Pickens Water Reservoir. These levels could be harmful and warrant intensive investigation."

The memorandum included an explanation of the chemical nature of PCBs and added that they "give rise for concern because of their persistence in the environment and tendency to accumulate in food chains, with possible adverse effects on animals at the top of the food webs, including man." No mention is made of the studies conducted by Dr. Priester in 1970.

McAndrew recommended that six procedures be undertaken, one of which would "determine PCB concentrations in fish" in the Pickens-Twelve Mile Creek - Lake Hartwell area. DHEC analysts did not have to travel far in search of fish to sample. In a freezer somewhere within DHEC's laboratories lay two fish which were collected for analysis in July, 1974. One was taken at a bridge over Twelve Mile Creek on secondary road 273, the other at a bridge over the creek on S. C. Hwy. 33. The fish, along with a number of others taken at various times during 1974 and 1975, had been stored in the freezer for nearly a year and a half when the memorandum was issued. One former DHEC employee told Osceola that he suspected the fish were not analyzed "because they knew what they would find." However, it seems equally likely that DHEC officials were simply not thinking in terms of health dangers from PCB contamination.

Should they have been thinking in these terms?

It seems reasonable to suppose that they should have been, given the proliferation of information about potential PCB hazards during the period 1972-1975, and the knowledge on the part of some DHEC officials (Priester in particular) that a PCB problem existed in the Hartwell area.

In a late August interview with Tom Mason of the Greenville News, Dr. Don Robinson, chief of DHEC's bureau of occupational health and safety, stated that the technological proliferation of potentially hazardous compounds has made it difficult for public health agencies to effectively monitor all of them. "Health officials," Mason wrote in a column following the interview, "can't really get excited about the Lake Hartwell situation when they know that PCBs are everywhere — even in the Yukon River of Alaska — and there's no way to remove them ..."

Someone eventually did get excited, however; a public health warning was issued on August 13 banning commercial fishing in Lake Hartwell and cautioning fishermen not to eat the fish. Presumably, the logic behind the warning is that while there may be many substances which are harming us without our knowledge, let us at least avoid those we know about.

While a caution against the consumption of fish eventually was issued, DHEC did not act with any great haste. Results from the tests on the frozen fish were reported to DHEC administrators on March 31, 1976, almost three months after McAndrews' report. The results showed that one of the 1974 fish contained 135.7 ppm PCB, 130 ppm over the FDA limit. Fresh samples gathered in April also showed PCB levels well over the FDA limit. A warning was finally issued three months later.

They're everywhere... ...They're everywhere

"The range of PCB uses is so broad that hardly anyone can escape some contact with them," science writer Robert H. Boyle wrote in the November, 1975 issue of Audobon Magazine. Boyle included a list of past and present uses of polychlorinated biphenyls which was provided by EPA to the Lake Michigan Toxic Substances Committee:

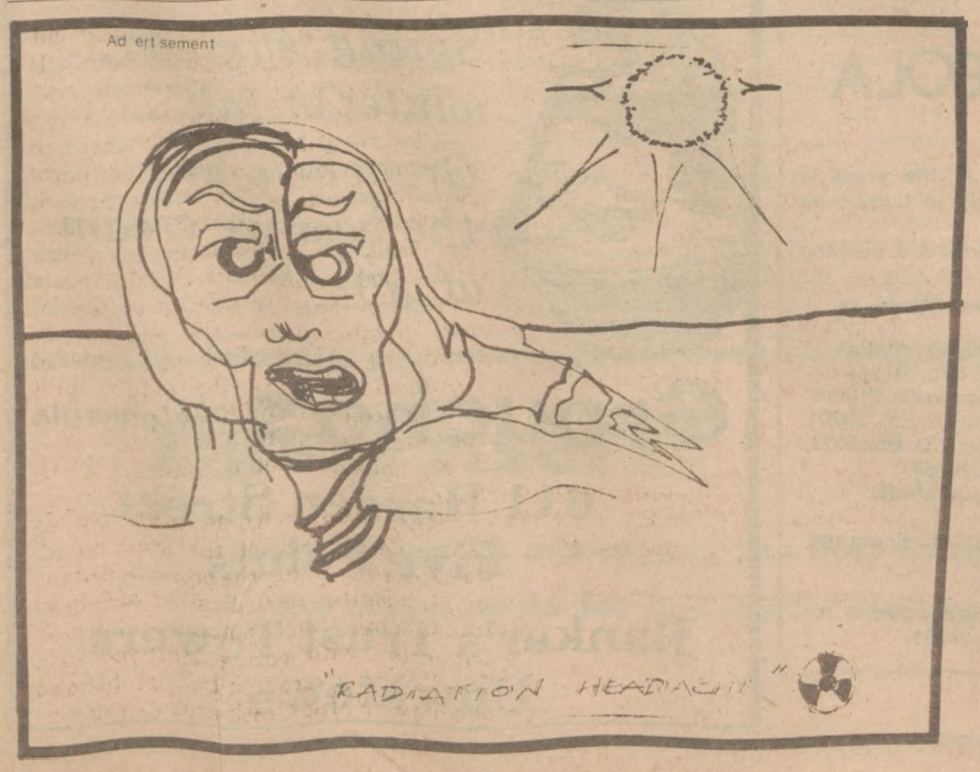
In transformers and power capacitors; as hydraulic fluids; as a diffusion pump oil; in heat transfer applications; as plasticizers; as adhesives in the manufacture of brake linings, clutch faces, and grinding wheels; in making safety and acoustical glass; and as a laminate of ceramics and metals.

In making washable wall coverings and upholstering materials; in adhesives for envelopes and tapes; in coatings for ironing board covers; as a delustering agent for rayons; as a flame-proofer for synthetic yarns; in waterproofing of canvas; as additives in paints and varnishes; in film casting solutions; in insulating tapes; in protection lacquers; in making plastic bottles; and in epoxy resins for protective coating of metals.

As a widely used additive in sealants—for caulking compounds and putty, for concrete and asphalt, as well as in fireproofing sealants for floors, doors, ceilings, and partitions.

In printing industry, in the making of "carbonless" carbon papers; as a coating for papers used in thermographic duplicating machines; as an additive in xerographic transfer process (in Xerox toner); and as a plasticizer for printing plates and flexographic plates.

PCBs also are a byproduct of paper recycling, and have been identified in hardwood and softwood pulps. They are found in toilet soaps, barrier creams, in hydrated lime used to manufacture glass, in water treatment chemicals, in primer paints, coloring compounds, degreasers, in additives to zinc alloys and in waxes used in the tool and die-casting process.



That's just one of the topics of interest you can read about in Osceola, for only $8 a year.

Random thoughts

At halftime of his Clemson radio broadcasts this football season, anchorman Jim Phillips has been experimenting with a "talk-show" format where listeners on the 40-station network call in and ask questions about the first half of the game, or anything else for that matter.

It's a noble experiment in one-to-one communication with the fans, even though technical difficulties in transmitting the call from fan to main station (WFBC in Greenville) to Phillips have caused a lot of troubles.

And as the season grew progressively unsuccessful, one wondered how long the questions would continue in the non-sensical vein (e.g., How many first downs did Clemson git?"). Finally, the other day, as Clemson was taking a thrashing from traditionally mediocre Wake Forest, one brash caller broached the question.

"Jim, how come coach Bob Edwards (Clemson president R. C. Edwards) and his assistant Red Parker, haven't been fired?" asked the caller in a slow drawl, easily understandable to the radio audience.

Phillips hesitated, tapped on his mike (or so it sounded like) and responded, "How's that? I can't hear you. We must have a bad connection. Could you repeat that?"

"Yeah, how come coach Bob Edwards and his assistant, Red Parker, are still coaching. Can't Clemson get someone who can win in there," said the caller again, slowly, deliberately.

But it was no use. "I still can't hear you," Phllips pleaded. "I guess we'll have to go on to the next caller. Sorry."

The rest of the Saturday calls came in clear as day.

Just about everyone who attended Saturday night's USC-Virginia game at the stadium departed with two distinct impressions of the evening: 1) the weather was much cooler than expected, and 2) so were the Gamecocks.

Complaints were available in abundance from the USC loyalists, who were chilled to the bone by the cool temperatures and who weren't exactly left frenzied by the occurrences on the field. It may have been a 35-7 victory, unheard of in the old days, but it wasn't an artistic triumph by any means.

USC coach Jim Carlen suggested afterward that perhaps USC fans have already become spoiled, not only expecting victories for their $56 season tickets, but theatrics, drama as well.

Carlen was at least half-correct. USC fans are a complaining bunch, as the previous occupant of his chair came to realize. And even Carlen's 11-6 regular season record over two years hasn't served to quiet them entirely. Clemson supporters should have it so good.

USC fans are a strange lot. Williams-Brice Stadium on a Saturday night is not so much a glorified football field as it is a social beaker. The game sometimes almost seems to be an afterthought. Fans arrive late, and were spotted leaving as early as the middle of the third quarter last weekend. Of course, in the old days, fans streamed from the stadium as soon as Carolina fell more than a touchdown behind in the second half, a routine that grew to antagonize Paul Dietzel to no end. Nearly 3,000 fans who held tickets to Saturday night's contest didn't even bother to show up.

Part of the problem this season has been the schedule, which included home games against Appalachian, Duke and Virginia in the first half of the season, teams that don't inspire passion. Duke has a respectable team, but played horribly here. USC's primary games — Georgia, Georgia Tech and Baylor — have been on the road and virtually inaccessible to the average fan.

Moreover, the Gamecock offense is not nearly so compelling as it was last season. The offensive line has been bothered by youth and the loss of tackle Jerome Provence because of an injury (he's back now). Consequently, running plays that backs Kevin Long and Clarence Williams gained eight or ten yards on a year ago have gained more in the two to five yard range this season. Breakaway runs have been less frequent, too, although Williams did score on a 68-yard one on the first play of the second half against Virginia.

Whatever the reason for what fans perceive to be the problems related to a 4-2 record, things should pick up soon. The schedule intensifies in the next two weeks with Mississippi and Notre Dame here on consecutive Saturdays. The game Saturday night with Ole Miss could be the pivotal contest, and certainly the next two weeks will dictate the degree of the season's success.

"We need a full house with everyone on their feet hollering for us the whole time," Carlen said on his TV show Sunday.

He'll probably get the full house, but if things aren't looking good around the fourth quarter, USC fans will be getting to their feet, but it'll probably be in order to leave, not to applaud.

The National Football League — and to a lesser extent, the NCAA — must act soon in order to take the appropriate action to protect quarterbacks and other victims of the sometimes vicious attacks that are being administered by football defenses these days.

On Sunday, seven NFL quarterbacks were injured, and that was only the latest barrage of what has become a disturbing trend in the league.

Quarterbacks are particularly vunerable to the attackers since the physical requirements of throwing a forward pass leave them easy prey for on-rushing linemen. Anyone who saw the savage blow absorbed by Terry Bradshaw in Pittsburgh's game against Cleveland Sunday should realize that something must be done. Bradshaw, who is much bigger than the average NFL quarterback, was plucked from the ground by defensive lineman Joe Jones of Cleveland and tossed to the turf where he landed on his neck. The blow sent shock waves through his body, which jerked uncontrollably for several minutes. The extent of his injuries are still undetermined.

It would be one thing if all of the injuries occurred in the simple processes of blocking and tackling. But they aren't.

It has become increasingly obvious to all but the most naive observers — and certainly clearly obvious to the players — that which team wins a game (and hence, which team takes the playoff riches) is often determined by which team is healthy, physically capable of competing to the best of its abilities. Therefore, decapacitating injuries have a sort of sordid utility.

Two weeks ago on ABC's Monday night football game, Washington quarterback Bill Kilmer was standing with the ball after a play had been whistled dead by the officials. Suddenly, a Philadelphia lineman roared through the line (no one even tried to block him, for the play was over) and annihilated Kilmer. No penalty was called. Kilmer couldn't even lift his arm above his head for three days afterward and still can't throw properly, because of the Philadelphia incident and previous injuries. And the Redskins have lost two straight games.

A couple of weeks ago, NFL commissioner Pete Rozelle fined two Oakland players for excessive violence. An Oklahoma player was tossed out of Saturday's game against Texas after he administered a debilitating clothesline tackle to a Longhorn halfback, who lay on the ground helpless for several minutes.

Injuries will continue in football. Players are bigger, faster, more mobile and hit harder than ever before. But there is a difference between football and a savage, inhumane version of what kids jokingly call "kill the quarterback."

Plundering the past

Genevieve Bujold and Cliff Robertson

Brian DePalma's new "Obsession" is about the bizarre and even incestuous results that can occur from trying to recreate the past, so it's almost too obvious an irony that the failure of DePalma's film is from just such a reason. "Obsession" is basically an homage/glorification/bag job of Hitchcock's "Vertigo," in which James Stewart became obsessed with turning Kim Novak into a dead lover. This time it's Cliff Robertson who experiences the grief and guilt when his wife (Genevieve Bujold) and daughter are kidnapped and then accidentally killed because he follows police advice and fails to pay the ransom. Sixteen years later he meets someone who looks just like her, and his obsession with turning her into his wife becomes psychosis when she is herself kidnapped (he thinks). He deeds a tract of land worth millions over to a friend (John Lithgow) in order to this time atone for his mistake by paying up.

Without divulging more of the ending, I'll just say that it has overtones of incest, and there's obviously more than a little incest in the way DePalma and his screenwriter, Paul Schrader, have used Hitchcock. Not only the plot, but shots (that final 360 degree circular track) and whole chunks of style (the first shot of the church, the facade of which Robertson has mimicked in his wife's memorial) come out of Hitchcock's movie. DePalma has used Bernard Herrman for the music, and Herrman's score sounds remarkably like what he wrote for "Vertigo" 18 years earlier. (If you're familiar with that soundtrack on records, you can even catch a few bars lifted directly from the previous film.) The surprise character revelations at the end are another favorite Hitchcock device.

In fact, before long viewers may find themselves experiencing the same deja vu that Robertson has in the movie. This isn't just variations on a theme by Hitchcock or a remake, in which the director imposes his own style on someone else's plot, but an attempt to recreate the past with DePalma in the Hitchcock role — a bogus means of artistic creation. Of course it's all done in the name of homage, but just where does homage step over the line into plagiarism? DePalma, like a high school term paper writer, can be said to have liked Hitchcock's film so much that he has simply appropriated it. He pulled much the same stunt in his "Sisters" in which he mated "Psycho" and "Rear Window," but that film was such a low-budget improvisation — almost a parody — that it didn't seem so bad. "Obsession" is a major studio release, a star vehicle, currently number one on Variety's list of top moneymakers, and ... what can you say ... a rip-off.

Furthermore, just as Bogdanovich has shown the sterile and even ridiculous results of trying to relive the past ("At Long Last Love" may have been a detailed homage to Astaire-Rogers, but does anyone remember it as more than another crappy movie?), DePalma as Hitchcock is a flop because their sensibilities are worlds apart. The fastidious Hitchcock would take his murder mysteries and spy stories and turn them into little cadenzas of virtuoso storytelling. His almost total control over his (rather limited) medium allowed him to manipulate our response both emotionally and at the sheer wit of the shocks and surprises. But even Hitchcock can't do Hitchcock anymore — all the old formulas are worn out — and DePalma can't make them work because despite his considerable talents as a director, he is basically a slob. Films like "Greetings" and "Sisters" with their loose structure and occasionally quirky scenes or characters seem more in DePalma's line than the tightly put together "Phantom of the Paradise," which was edited by someone else. DePalma tries to pull together "Obsession" with one of those rhymed Hitchcock endings, but there are so many loose ends left flapping around that only the most hard-core fanatic would willingly suspend disbelief. Just why didn't the last kidnapper leave the hideout? Why didn't the police search the place after the escape? Can we really believe in Genevieve's explained motivation or the almost off-hand handling of her attempted suicide? Isn't the explanation for the entire story a rather creaky plot contrivance? Hitchcock's plots, while frequently improbable, almost always dealt in situations that were at least plausible — that could have happened. DePalma and several other current Hitchcock imitators, such as Nicholas Roeg in "Don't Look Now" and Richard Donner in "The Omen," get their effects upon the audience and then damn the explanations — either by resorting to the supernatural or simply omitting them; like a murder mystery that leaves out the clues, they cheat at the very game they're playing.

> "....'Obsession' is a major studio release, a star vehicle, currently number one on Variety's list of top moneymakers, and ...what can you say... a rip-off..."

What it comes down to is a question of craftsmanship — for after all, what other trait was most famously Hitchcock's? - and DePalma is simply not a commercial-style craftsman, capable of the sort of storytelling competence of even an apparent hack like Donner. While Schrader has said that he wanted to write a love story to end all love stories, there's hardly a moment in "Obsession" — from the opening organ chords varied by celestial choir to the final reunion — that seems to achieve its intended effect. For example, at the beginning Bujold gives shirtless Robertson a look of almost embarrassing lust, and when the camera cuts back to him, stoop shouldered and flabby chested, one has to hold back a howl. For that matter, compared to James Stewart and Kim Novak they're a rather insipid pair of lovers throughout the picture. Bujold, a fine actress, manages to at least be interesting, but Robertson gives a strange, crabby performance, proving as in just about everywhere else I've ever seen him that he's still playing Charly, the hero of "Flowers For Algernon" who can't quite figure out what's going on.

"Obsession" has reportedly been in post-production for more than a year, and one can't help but think that DePalma has been using all that time to try to pull together this mess. In fact, one can detect lurking beneath the surface of this movie — in the Creole inspector's accent or the John Lithgow character in toto — the beginnings of another DePalma parody. Which is probably how he should have played it. Or better still, left out all the plot gimmickry and simply made it a psychological study of a man obsessed with recreating his dead wife. The movie has some fine things in it, such as Vilmos Zsigmond's muted photography, and this last would be the approach to which DePalma's talents are more suited. He's a director whom I admire very much, with a formalist, almost Wellsian (or Greg Tolandian?) approach to camera usage and more of an abstracting intelligence than any of the other directors of the current American new wave--but he needs a subject. The man who could give such profound overtones to a film like "Phantom of the Paradise" is worthy of more than a second-rate imitation of Hitchcock.

DHEC is now in the process of conducting an intensive study of Pickens residents, including past and present employees of Sangamo, to determine to what extent, if any, PCBs have affected their health adversely. The size of the test group in the Pickens study will make it one of the most comprehensive yet carried out in the U. S.

Few scientists have been willing to predict how long it will take for PCB levels in Lake Hartwell fish to drop sufficiently to make fishing safe again. Fish already contaminated are likely to remain so until they die. New fish will continue to be contaminated until such time as the PCBs on the lake bottom are covered over and removed from the food chain.

Meanwhile, PCB contamination has been discovered in fish samples and sediment samples taken from other streams and lakes in South Carolina. Low levels of PCB were found in Clark Hill Reservoir. DHEC analysis of other fish and sediment samples taken during 1974 and 1975 have revealed small amounts of PCB contamination in the Pee Dee River, the Reedy River, the Tyger River, the raw water supply of Easley and the finished drinking water of the town of Norris. The largest amount of PCB found in fish other than those from the Hartwell area came from samples taken in July, 1975 at the Mountain Lake Colony swimming area in Greenville County — 3.2 ppm, below present FDA limits but above the Canadian limit of 2 ppm.

> "...DHEC analysts did not have to travel far in search of fish to sample. In a freezer somewhere within DHEC's laboratories lay two fish which were collected for analysis in July, 1974.. One former DHEC employee suspected the fish were not analyzed 'because they knew what they would find'..."

In an unrelated study conducted in Charleston County in 1970, blood samples from 723 volunteers were analyzed for pesticides and PCB. Forty-three percent of those tested had PCB residues in their bodies. None could be identified as being involved in PCB-related work.

The fact is that PCBs have been used for so many different pruposes in so many different products over the past 50 years that it is extremely difficult to detect and eliminate all PCB sources. A 1973 report from the Woods Hole Oceanographic Institute stated in part: "PCBs are found universally in the sewage of major cities ... PCBs have been found in all organisms analyzed from the North and South Atlantic oceans, even in animals living under 11,000 feet of water ... Based on available data it seems safe to assume that PCBs are present in varying concentrations in every species of wildlife on Earth."

As reporter Mason so succinctly put it in an August 29 Greenville News column, "Contaminants are everywhere." In a recent conversation with Osceola a former employee of the state's health programs added some embellishment: "All we can do is try to avoid contaminants where we know they exist. And if DHEC hasn't done its homework, we won't know where these things are. If strong evidence exists that a particular substance is hazardous to our health, they've got to start watching out for it; they've got to put economic and political considerations aside. I mean, if they don't do it, who will?"

Following years of pressure from private environmental groups, President Ford on Oct. 13 signed into law legislation which imposes a two-year ban on the usage of polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs). The legislation also gives the Environmental Protection Agency power to prevent or limit any chemicals' use until after a study of its health and environmental impact.

Political Economy

Democrats know how to cure an ailing economy. But needless to say, many Americans, propagandized for eight years by Republican Oldspeak, only whimper that the Democrats will usher in a new era of inflation and "communistic" government spending. These purveyors of the conventional wisdom seem to ignore that the Republican administration, in classic Republican fashion, has brought the nation the highest unemployment, highest inflation, highest federal government budget deficits and worse balance of payments deficits since World War II. This is sound economics?

Well, what can one say? The rightwing press isn't concerned about all that. It's only worry is that Jimmy Carter, sinner that he is, granted an interview to Playboy Magazine, house organ of Beelzebub Himself. Naturally, these Republican geniuses forgot, in their conniptions, that such conservative lights as Barry Goldwater and William F. Buckley, Jr. have also appeared in Playboy's pages. No, rather than wonder about economic issues, which after all require actual though processes, the Republicans prefer to rage over the Playboy interview, and this tells us something about the campaign, the stature of our present leadership, and the depths of moral hypocrisy in the nation.

CINEMA

"Ebony, Ivory and Jade," and "Black Shampoo" constitute the double feature. Call the theatre for times.

ATLANTIC II THEATRE, 3220 Two Notch Road, 786-0790

"Street Girls" and "My Master, My Love" are scheduled, Call the theatre for times.

CAROLINA THEATRE, 1323 Main Street, 252-8011

"Black Streetfighter covers most of the action genre bases with shows at 1:40, 3:30, 5:20, 7:10, and 9 with the two early shows dropping during the week. Rated R.

COLUMBIA EAST I THEATRE, 7369 Garner's Ferry Road, 776-0350

Double feature of "Bambi" and "Witch Mountain." A lotta Disney, but "Bambi" is of course always worth seeing. Shows at 5:30 and 8:30 with an additional 2:30 on the weekend.

COLUMBIA EAST II THEATRE, 7369 Garner's Ferry Road, 776-0350

"The Return of the Pink Panther" returns. It's Peter Sellers in a number of disguises and a fairly funny if sort of sleepy spoof. Rated PG, with shows at 1, 3, 5, 7:15, and 9:15. No matinees during the week.

DUTCH SQUARE NORTH THEATRE, Dutch Square Mall, 798-1110

"The Longest Yard." Columbia's favorite football movie comes back to town. Burt Reynolds' tongue-in-cheek self-parody is fairly appealing this time; plus, with this story — about prison cons playing their sadistic guards — director Robert Aldrich pulls out all the last minute touchdown, win-one-for-the-gipper stops you didn't know you had in you while funnily putting down the whole business. An interesting comparison with "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest," since both basically derive from Ken Kesey. R. 5:05, 7:10, and 9:30 with a 3 show on the weekend.

DUTCH SQUARE SOUTH THEATRE, Dutch Square Mall, 798-1110

"A Matter of Time." Vincente Minelli directing his daughter, Liza, in a nostalgic tale about a high society lady (Bergman) and a hotel maid both recalling the past of the forties. PG. 5:30, 7:15, 9, with 1:30 and 3:40 shows on the weekend.

FOX THEATRE, 1607 Main Street, 254-5212

"Noon til Three." Apparently more than the title of this new Western alludes to "High Noon," but that's allwe know about it. With Charles Bronson and Jill Ireland, R. 1:40, 3:30, 5:20, 7:10, and 9; the first two shows are for the weekend only.

GAMECOCK I THEATRE, Parkland Plaza Shopping Center, 796-0022

"The Great Scout and Cathouse Thursday." Funny Western takeoff with a filmful of outlandish character — well played by Lee Marvin, Strother Martin, Oliver Reed, Elizabeth Ashley, Robert Culp, and (less well) Kay Lenz. R. 1, 3, 5, 7, and 9; no afternoon features during the week.

GAMECOCK II THE ATRE, Parkland Plaza Shopping Center, 796-0022

"Sex With a Smile." The grin is on Marty Feldman's face in this Italian made comedy that looks like a sleazer. R. 1, 3, 5, 7, and 9, and once again the afternoon shows drop.

JEFFERSON SQUARE THEATRE, Jefferson Square Downtown, 254-6731

"The Adventures of Robin Hood." The 1938 classic with Errol Flynn, Claude Rains, Olivia DeHaviland and Basil Rathbone will be the first film, in Columbia's trial balloon alternative theatre. We hate to have to say it, but the company is already considering cancellation if this series doesn't do reasonably well in the first few weeks, so if you're at all interested, by all means go. It may be your only chance for getting a future alternative to the plague of reruns. It goes at 1, 3, 5, 7, and 9 with no afternoon shows during the week. The twilight bargain hour will be in effect, which means $1.25 seats at 5 o'clock

MIRACLE THEATRE, 1228 Main Street, 256-1950

"Marathon Man." New mystery with Laurence Olivier, Michael Caine, directed by John Schlesinger. Call about the show times.

PALMETTO THEATRE, 1417 Main Street, 254-5800

"The Bawdy Adventures of Tom Jones." Recent English light porn spoof; this one sounds godawful. 7:20 and 9 shows at night. The late show on the 15th and 16th will be "Linda Lovelace For President."

PLAZA III THEATRE, 1223 Main Street, 254-7960

"Car Wash." Would you believe a singing car wash? This new musical stars George Carlin and Richard Pryor and has gotten so-so press so far. PG. 1, 3, 5, 7, and 9. — the two matinees for the weekend only.

RICHLAND MALL I THEATRE, Richland Mall, 782-2228

"The Omen." If you'll bite at the rather hokey supernatural hocus pocus, count on some good scares from this well put together thriller about the coming of the anti-Christ. Gregory Peck and Lee Remick are in it. 3, 5, 7, and 9 during the week.R.

RICHLAND MALL II THEATRE, Richland Mall, 782-2228

"Special Delivery." Sounds like postage due on this obscure vehicle starring Bo Svenson and Cybil Shepherd. PG. 3:20, 5:20, 7:20, and 9:20, the last two shows only during the week. The late show her on October 15 and 16 will be "Harold and Maude."

ART

An exhibition of the work of 13 South Carolina photographers, professional and non-professional, will be on display at the USC Russell House art gallery through the month of October. USC art professor Philip Mullen will have one man exhibition of paintings at the Columbia Museum of Art from October 17 through November 16. Mullen will have 31 abstract pieces of all sizes, and has described the major characteristic of his work as subtlety of design and "the ability to grow in richness over the years."

A special exhibition of Oriental art will be presented Friday and Saturday, October 15 and 16, at the Columbia Museum of Art between the hours of 10 a.m. and 4:30 p.m. There will be 500 pieces from Japan and the Far East, the oldest of these dating back to the 18th and 19th Centuries.
